

Bio

Hi! My name is Lucas He, currently a freshman in the Fast Track Program. I was born on May 26, 2000, on perhaps the only dry afternoon of Pullman, Washington's history. I'd like to describe a childhood growing up in a stunning countryside of lush forests and stunning mountains but rather I was soon brought to Shanghai when I was two to experience a bustling city filled with pollution, progress, and potential. Briefly prior was the divorce of my parents whose circumstances and reasons I could not remember and could only recently understand. Thus, I went with my mom to China, where I lived with my grandparents and cousin and developed my Chinese culture.

When I was six, I transferred to Tucson, Arizona, where I would live with my dad and step-mother to attend elementary in America. After that came a pretty unspectacular journey through public education involving several new schools and new towns before I ended up in Eastvale, California, where I consider the true beginning of my American life. From the middle of fourth grade to the end of senior year, I lived in among dairy farms rapidly gentrified into sprawling suburban with newly developed neighborhoods every two blocks. There, I developed passions in music, involved in classical, jazz, and marching groups, tennis, joining the school team, and computers, both recreationally and professionally. From there on lead to my admission to UCLA where I am grateful to be and eager to create new additions to this meager biography.
